WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

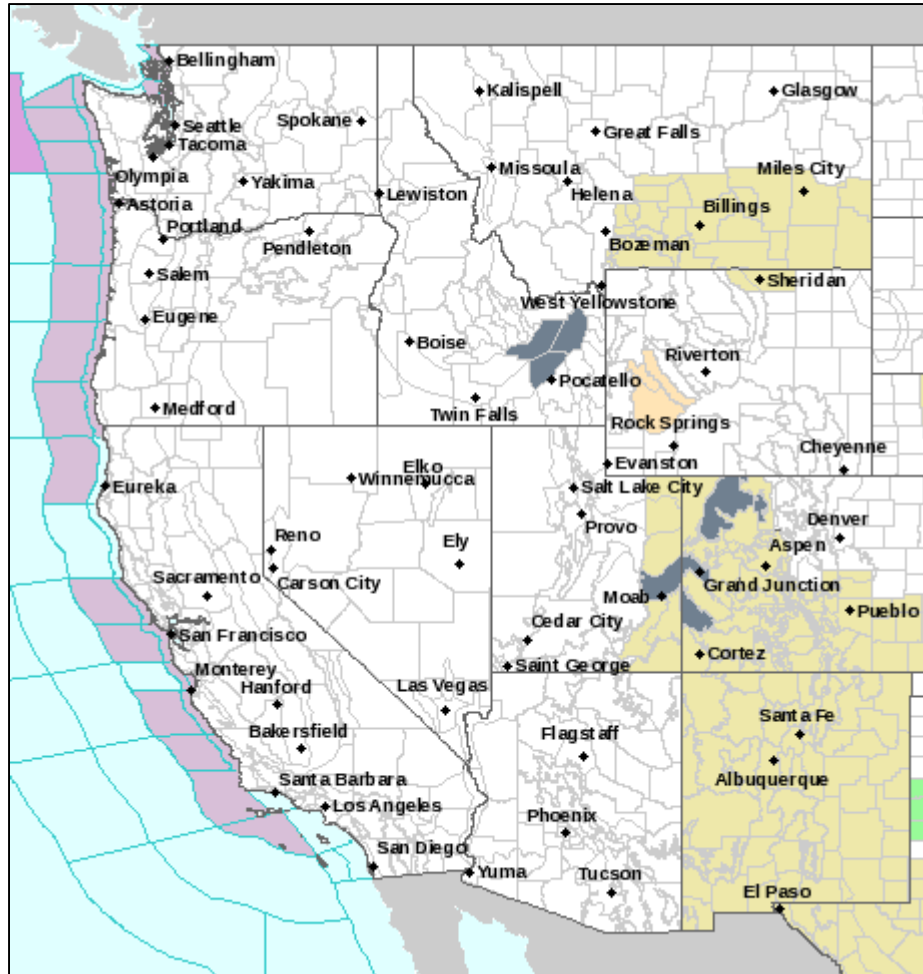

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

- High pressure will be over Northern California through Saturday.
- Most areas will be dry with above normal temperatures. The exception will be Friday night when a low pressure trough moving through the Pacific NW brings a slight chance of light rain to far NW CA.
- N-NE/Offshore winds will gust to 15-25 mph in a few wind-prone areas from the western Cascade-Sierra crest to the coast during nights and mornings through Saturday.
- A low pressure trough will move through the region Sunday and Monday.
- Light to locally moderate rain possible north of a Clear Lake-Quincy line. All areas will see cooler temperatures, higher relative humidity (RH), and gusty S-SW winds. The strongest winds will be from the Shasta Valley eastward across Siskiyou and Modoc Counties.
- High pressure will return late Monday and remain in place through the end of the week. Conditions will turn warm and dry with gusty N-NE/Offshore winds again.
- N-NE/Offshore winds may reach critical strength, especially on Tuesday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

- Cool, onshore flow will continue across the region today. Locally gusty north winds will be possible in Santa Barbara County this morning and along the central coast during the afternoon hours today and Wednesday. A strong warming trend will occur Thursday through Saturday before cooler weather will likely return next Sunday.
- High temperatures in the 50s in the mountains to near 80 in the valleys today and Wednesday. By Friday, highs will be in the upper 80s to near 90 in the valleys.
- North wind gusts to 25 mph this morning in Santa Barbara County. Similar winds expected along the central coast during the afternoon hours. Light northeast winds under 20 mph will be possible in the mountains late this week.
- Minimum humidity in the 25-35% range over most areas. The central coast interior will continue to see readings in the teens throughout the period. Look for minimum RH to drop significantly Thursday into the weekend.
- No precipitation is expected throughout the period.
